

THE BETROTHAL
While the betrothal is being celebrated, the rejected lover, furious over his rival's success, steals into the camp and kills the huntsman. At once the entire camp is in an uproar determined to catch the fleeing scoundrel.

The murderer tries to evade his pursuers. He crawls through bushes, rides over mountains, but all of no avail; he is captured at last, bound to a horse and dragged into camp by the Gypsy Queen.

The murderer is surrounded by the Gypsies. The Gypsy Queen takes a revolver, and shoots the murderer right through the heart, killing him the same way as he killed her lover. The Gypsy falls over the dead Huntsman and thus the Huntsman's death is avenged.

Length, 785 Feet.

While the cowboys are entertaining themselves an Indian enters almost exhausted. He asks for a drink, which is gladly given. While the cowboys and girls enjoy themselves, Jack, the cowboy, and James, the greaser, step out doors, apparently waiting for somebody. Two young ladies arrive on horseback, dismount, and together with the cowboys, enter the dance hall. Jack and James ask for the first dance. The beautiful cowboy queen seems to favor Jack. This incites the jealousy of James, the greaser, who draws his knife, as if to stab Jack. The cowboy queen interferes and proposes a horseback race between the two rival suitors for her hand.

The race for the girl's hand is a very fast one. Jack, the cowboy, is victorious, and is heartily received by the cowboy queen. All go inside, except James, the greaser, and his friend Jim, who conspire to kidnap the cowboy queen, which plan is carried out at once. They overpower the girl, place her on horseback and ride off.

After a long, tedious ride, James, the greaser carries the exhausted girl into the thick of the bushes. Jim, his pal, rides ahead with both the horses, so as to mislead the pursuers.

The absence of the cowboy queen is soon noticed. There is great excitement in camp. All start out to hunt for the missing girl. The Indian who just arrived on horseback jumps off his horse and trails after the fleeing criminals. The cowboys, guided by the Indian, have closed in on Jim. He is pursued and shot off his horse. After the Indian made sure that the greaser was dead he pursued the trail, which leads to the other villain's hiding place.
