INTRODUCTION

EDUCATION has concerned New Jersey residents, no less than those of other states, for generations. To document their changes in thought and practice, much source material exists. And a goodly amount of it can be found in the Rutgers Special Collections and University Archives.

Included are many published essays and addresses about education, often by clergymen or religious organizations, especially Presbyterian. Some bespeak the social benefits of education, others its usefulness to the church. Still others have to do entirely with religious instruction, e.g., Sunday school.

It was found in 1828 that one-fifth of New Jersey's voters were illiterate. This is not to suggest that the state was without schools. Through the years there were, in fact, many—variously called seminaries, institutes, English and classical schools, several so-called colleges, day schools, boarding schools, academies, etc.—whose publications survive. They were usually small, and private, though occasionally with some degree of sponsorship by religious bodies (e.g., the Episcopal Diocese of New Jersey) or local groups. With a few hardy exceptions, such as the Newark Academy, they were commonly short-lived.

The schools were designed to serve (1) young children, (2) "young ladies," and (3) young gentlemen, or a combination of these. Some taught the mere basics; others the classics, science, Latin, French and German. In time there were special schools for music, nursing, pharmacy, business subjects, military academies, and of course normal schools, for teachers. From the early 1800's there were theological seminaries, first Princeton and New Brunswick, later Drew and others.

In stages a public school system evolved. With it came a new literature concerned with the theory and working of the system, methods of instruction, the training and status of teachers.

This bibliography contains 921 entries, in which are recorded some 1365 individual publications. It is a record primarily of separate printed items. To these have been added, however, some historical compilations in manuscript and typescript form, and a few convenient periodical articles, most from the New Jersey Historical Society Proceedings (now New Jersey History) and the Somerset County Historical Quarterly.

Not included are the numerous publications of or about Princeton and Rutgers universities, and most of those relating to Sunday schools.

Also excluded are the manuscript records of certain schools and teachers which are held by Special Collections and University Archives.

LOCATION CODE

The items recorded here are from eight categories of Special Collections. When the searching was nearly done, it belatedly occurred to the compiler that some clues to their location were needed. Accordingly he searched them out once again and to most descriptions added one or another of these designations:

- b legislative bills and resolutions (N.J.)
- c cataloged publications
- nb New Brunswick file
- nbb New Brunswick broadsides
- njb New Jersey broadsides
- p classified pamphlets or serials, uncataloged
- pc pamphlet collection with separate catalog
- r Rutgers archives

576. THE PRINCETONIAN, PRINCETON, N.J. ... The New Jersey Legislature recently passed a bill, the intent of which was to disfranchise all students of any institution of learning located in this state. On the face of the facts, the motives which led to ... this bill are bad. They are strictly characteristic of the demagogue. For several years there has been a small Republican majority in this town. The student vote is about three-fifths Republican ... It was clear, therefore, to the ... framers of this bill, that, if they could exclude the student vote, the town ... would be secured to the Democracy ... [Princeton, N.J., 1878] [4]p. njb
